

Center for Teaching Excellence – Reflective Practice Teaching Circles Mini-Grant Application ~ 2014-2015

DUE NO LATE THAN 4:30 pm on October 10, 2014

Contact Person(s): Bryna Siegel Finer

Department: English

University Address: Leonard 209C

University Telephone: 72267 E-mail Address: brynasf@iup.edu

Project Title: Material Resources in Teaching Liberal Studies English

Collaborating Faculty Names: Maha Alawdat, Rachel Griffo, Maria Bodenshatz, Kittiphong Praphan, Oriana Gatta, Rachael Warmington, Carolyn Wisniewski, Helen Sitler, Lynn Shelly, Tomoko Nuske,

Amount Requested: $418.23

Brief Project Abstract (attach longer proposal):

For this project, our teaching circle is asking for funding to purchase materials that we will experiment with in our Liberal Studies English (LSE) courses (Composition I, Composition II, and Humanities Literature). These materials include items like large post-it paper on which groups of students can write together; small post-it notes that help students to organize written thoughts individually and physically move them around; crayons that allow students to highlight, trace, and categorize different types of thoughts on their paper; and index cards that they can use in a variety of interactive ways for their own writing and to write collaboratively.

The use of materials such as these is not new, particularly in education classrooms, but a conversation in our first Teaching Circle (September 3) showed that few of have used materials like these in our teaching in significant ways, despite knowing how useful they are to our own writing practices. In that first meeting, we also had a presentation by Helen Sitler, Professor of English Education, who showed us how she uses these materials not just to teach her English Education students how to teach secondary education students, but also in her LSE courses. The value of these sorts of materials and their influence on student engagement has been explored in depth by education researchers like Howard Gardner in his numerous publications on learning styles, as well as in publications on writing tutoring (see Miles, et al, Writing Lab Newsletter these low-fi technologies, these tactile, kinetic, and tangible technologies, can be used in our own classrooms; we think that the chance to experiment with different activities and different approaches across the three LSE courses will provide ample amounts of data for conversation and possibly scholarship in our teaching circle and beyond.

Each member of the teaching circle will use several of the tools throughout the year in his/her
We will then present our findings and practical applications to our department -author a short article on our findings as well, probably for the journal Pedagogy, which is interested in pieces on the teaching of writing from a practical perspective.

When Professor Sitler presented to us, she explained that she spends her own money to provide these materials for her students to use, but not all of us are able to do so. Instead, we are asking the Center for Teaching Excellence Reflective Practice project to fund these supplies so we, too, can practice using these tools with our students.

Our hope is that the discoveries we